

Where Are All the Sex Toys with Reviews?

Sex toys reviews are needed when we want to get a new vibrator or pocket pussy, so why do they seem scarce and hard to find? I don't mean in quantity, but in quality, because "It's good" doesn't help anyone with making a decision. I know that when I'm looking through male sex toys reviews to find out if the Autoblow is as awesome as the website makes it look, I'm having a hard time finding out why it's good. I mean c'mon, saying it feels good doesn't tell me why I should buy that over the Fleshlight.

Reviews sex toys have shouldn't be so complicated, but it seems sex toys with reviews from real people and real answers seems too much to ask. Why don't people talk about how the Autoblow might be huge but it's hands-free and maintains a great sucking pressure? I feel like adult sex toys reviews are written by kids with no vocabulary, or the people are still too busy getting off to leave sex toys reviews.

Male sex toys reviews are the worst, especially when there are so many details a person could actually write about the Fleshlight. It has a lot of custom options with different colors and styles available, but most men don't even mention which type they bought. How will I know if the bumps are better than the ribs without buying both?

Reviews sex toys come with aren't entirely trustworthy, either, because many manufacturers and distributors create their own reviews to promote the product. Still, even that's better than some of the adult sex toys reviews I saw for Aneros. I know it's a prostate massager and that it stays in place; the description tells me that. Sex toys with reviews should be telling me which lube goes well with it, or how it feels. I think the best place to go is websites that promote customer reviews, because there you'll hear things from real people, even if it is a simple "It's worth it."
